

EU's sales to UK plunge

The following is a recent report regarding UK/EU purchases and sales by Facts4EU.org.

“Official EU's sales to UK have plunged by £28 billion in five years - Brits reacting to hostile EU?”

Latest trade figures show big drop in EU purchases, huge jump in buying from Non-EU countries.

Proof that Brits are preferring to buy from the rest of the world.

Their analysis of the latest trade figures released by the Office for National Statistics on Tuesday (27th July 2021) reveals extraordinary, official evidence that the British are switching their buying preferences emphatically away from the EU and towards the rest of the world.

(Important: This report is about what the UK buys from abroad, NOT what we sell. It includes both goods and services. Readers will be familiar with reports about British exports but this is about British IMPORTS. Specifically it concerns the trend in what we are buying from the EU27 countries compared to what we are buying from other countries around the world.)

We compared the last quarter's results (Jan-Mar 2021) with the same quarter five years ago, just before the UK's referendum on EU membership when the majority of the British people voted to leave. We also looked at the five-year trend.

Summary - The five-year trend in British buying habits is firmly anti-EU
1. Q1 2021 compared to Q1 2016

British purchases from EU27: dropped by 9.3%

British purchases from non-EU increased by 16.3%

[Next we are still comparing 2021

to the pre-Referendum 2016]

In monetary terms, the EU's sales to the UK are down by £5.2bn, comparing the quarters.

Comparing the last 12 months to the year of 2016, the EU's lost sales amount to £27.8bn

This represents a drop of 11.3%, even more than the percentage drop for the last quarter alone

2. EU's share of UK's total purchases from abroad

Next we looked at UK purchases of international goods and services and where they came from.

Q1 2016: 55.7% came from EU27

Q1 2021: 49.5% came from EU27

Observations - For years there has been a growing backlash against the EU. Even many of those who voted Remain in 2016 have been shocked by the EU's bullying and unreasonable behaviour towards the United Kingdom.

We have observed an increasing number of people on social media advocating that we should 'buy British' first, from Commonwealth countries second, and from the rest of the world third. The EU is now seen as the last choice for many people – and even some of those would rather do without, than benefit the EU.

Above we have shown clear evidence from the official source – the ONS – that the EU's sales to the UK are falling, both in percentage and in real terms. And these are not small numbers. In the last 12 months alone the EU has lost sales totalling £27.8bn, compared to 2016.

What will Remainers say?

As ever, Remainers will try to deflect. They might start by talking about the Covid effect. This is nonsense of course, because the whole world is suffering under this and overall we are looking at the percentage swing in favour of purchases from non-EU countries. The EU is significantly down in the first quarter following our full departure on 1st January, whereas the rest of the world has risen dramatically.

Remainers might then confuse exports and imports, and say that EU sales to the UK are down because of new Brexit controls. Again this is nonsense. It is the EU that has imposed absurd and restrictive controls at its borders which have impacted UK sales to the bloc. By contrast the UK has adopted a 'light touch' on the EU27's sales into the UK, almost waving them through our borders.

Our analysis and report is about what Brexit Britain is buying from abroad and the figures do not look good for the EU.

Are we surprised?

No. Years of abusive behaviour by the EU towards the UK is bound to damage consumer opinion when it comes to making purchasing decisions. Why buy from a source of constant hostility, when there are excellent indigenous suppliers and alternatives from friendly countries around the world?

To our readers in the EU27 we would just say this. We have no observed no signs of hostility from the British people towards the citizens of EU27 countries. The 'beef', as we say, isn't with you. The beef is with the appalling way the United Kingdom has been treated – in particular by the EU Commission and EU parliament. If you felt bullied and treated like a non-voting colony, how would you react when choosing between a UK product and one from the EU27?"

Rodney Atkinson

Although this article was written by Atkinson in February 2021, we think it is still worth reprinting today.

As Pat Buchanan wrote: “It was President Bill Clinton who destroyed the independent US media when he permitted 90 percent of the US media to be concentrated in six mega-corporations that were in the entertainment and other businesses and not in the news business. This unprecedented concentration of media was against all American tradition and destroyed the reliance that our Founding Fathers placed on a free press to keep government accountable to the people.”

That dangerous aggregation of power of which Buchanan (the journalist and former White House Communications Director under Ronald Reagan) warned has produced the world wide threat posed today by the US corporate “Techs” who dominate through their digital platforms and social media so much political discourse, journalism and political censorship not only in the USA but across the world. The ultimate aggression by this corporatist hegemony against the democratic system and even nation states was the taking down of the accounts of the President of the United States – the “leader of the free world” now ridiculed by the countries whose authoritarian censoring totalitarianism now looks quite compatible with US internal politics!

Many countries have been fighting back – China with their ridicule and Russia, India, Australia, Hungary and Poland with legislation targeting US Tech power. The UK and France have introduced taxes on tech turnover as those corporations avoided taxes on profits and OECD countries are planning a more universal anti avoidance regime.

Poland, aware that social media companies have been attacking that country’s most basic religious and social values, are legislating to apply fines up to $13.5m for any form of ideological censorship. Like every other democrat in the world the Poles cannot accept commercial corporations acting as law makers, judge, jury and executioner as national legislatures stand idly by.

For the combat of incitement, obscene, violent or treasonous activities there are plenty of existing laws for which people must of course be prosecuted and defended in the courts. It is proof of the fundamentally fascist and totalitarian nature of these corporations and their far left ideological soul-mates that such natural justice never occurs to them!

As Poland’s Prime Minister Mateusz Morawiecki said:

“We are now increasingly faced with practices we believed were left in the past. The censoring of free speech, once the domain of totalitarian and authoritarian regimes, is now back, but in a new form, run by corporations, who silence those who think differently.”

.....Now let us look at the totalitarian censorship of the truth by one of the most powerful social media corporations – Twitter. When the New York Post its Twitter account revealed the contents of Joe Biden’s son’s laptop revealing the Bidens’ intimate business connections in China, Twitter locked the account down. Senator Ted Cruz during a Senate hearing on Tech activities asked the Twitter CEO Jack Dorsey:

“Mr. Dorsey, who the hell elected you and put you in charge of what the media are allowed to report and what the American people are allowed to hear”

The former owner of the repair shop where Hunter Biden left his laptop (and repeatedly refused to pick it up) is suing Twitter for defaming him as a “Hacker”.

“Plaintiff is not a hacker and the information obtained from the computer does not constitute hacked materials because Plaintiff lawfully gained access to the computer, first with the permission of its owner, BIDEN, and then, after BIDEN failed to retrieve the recovered data despite Plaintiff’s requests, in accordance with the Mac Shop’s abandoned property policy.”

Needless to say when Donald Trump’s Tax affairs were leaked Twitter did not block the New York Times which revealed the leaked information!

Dangerous censorship of scientific information

Twitter also suspended the account of the Chinese virologist Dr Li-Meng Yan who asserted that the COVID 19 virus was man made in a Wuhan laboratory. This has been claimed by many eminent scientists including the Nobel Prize winner Professor Luc Montagnier and a recent extensive study by the Hamburg Professor Dr Roland Wiesendanger.

She had discovered a cover-up operation by the Chinese government to publicly deny the virus pandemic despite being aware of its presence.

“I decided to report this development to my supervisor, who is also a World Health Organisation (WHO) consultant. There was no response from the WHO and my supervisor. Everyone warned me that do not cross the line and keep silence or else I would be made to disappear,” she said.

Dr Yan subsequently fled to the USA where she came up against Twitter! She had not violated any Twitter rule – but of course her revelation did not coincide with the western leftist medical establishment or Chinese communist propaganda! And we know where Twitter stands!

A different view of Covid

Derek Sterling

This book asks the questions often raised by many but apparently silenced by the government.

It starts with the raising the point that “each of us has to decide the truth about the Covid crisis”. Whilst accepting that it is a very nasty disease, which has lead to the death of many.

The main questions it raises are;

- * Is it naturally occurring?
- * Is it highly contagious
- * Is the death rate from it so high that we need to destroy our economy in order to manage the disease?
- * Is it really so dangerous that we need to shut down the world, forcing everyone to stay indoors and wear masks when shopping and at school?
- * Is it so dangerous that we must all be given a vaccine, and is the vaccine safe?

The final point it raises is, “although this is clearly a very nasty disease for those who catch it, at the time of writing, it has affected just 6.5% of the population and claimed the lives of less than 0.2%”.

It also states that 97% of the people who have caught Covid have recovered.

The second half of this book is the appendices, these give the information that it believes you require in order to answer the 101 questions regarding Covid that it has raised.

After reading this book you will be better informed about the reasons many have refused the vaccine and not accepted the governments reasons for wearing face masks.

Whether these reasons are true or false is up to the reader to judge, but having more information cannot be a bad thing!

A balanced view is surely better than the government controlling what the public are told.

However, I would still rather be vaccinated than not, better to be proved wrong later than suffering a long term illness or death!

Politics and free speech

And the African communist and long time China ally who heads the WHO also knows his political place!

India ready to crush Twitter - India's Prime Minister Narendra Modi has threatened to remove Twitter from India for spreading misinformation on over 1,000 accounts about a farmers' strike. A Twitter Executive could face 7 years in jail.

Twitter did at first blocked some 250 accounts in response to a legal notice by the government, citing objections based on public order but then restored the accounts, citing “insufficient justification” for continuing the suspension.

Then Twitter did another about turn and suspended 500 accounts but then said it would not block media companies journalists and politicians because that would (in their sickeningly hypocritical words given their removal of Trump in the USA) “violate their fundamental right to free expression under the Indian law”.

Twitter business - Twitter made a $1.4bn loss in 2020. It has only made one years profit since its foundation. In mid 2020 Twitter had daily activity of 186m tweets. Donald Trump's Twitter followers numbered 88m – and they have certainly now gone!

Many are asking who supports all these losses. And why would a rational investor suffer years of losses? Maybe they are making a profit in other ways? In other words paying for political advantage.

Ted Cruz rightly laughed when Twitter CEO Jack Dorsey said Twitter could not influence political votes. It is evident that some wealthy people or institutions think he can!

Twitter censorship - Twitter said its censorship of the president was based on how other people might read and interpret his words, specifically the question of ‘how [Trump's tweets] are being received and interpreted on and off Twitter’. Trump's comments ‘must be read’ in the broader context of how certain statements ‘can be mobilised by different audiences’.

Well we know how words by leading Democrats, BLM and ANTIFA were “read” – the devastation of US cities last summer bears witness to that. And yet there is no censorship of them, even though their words led to scores of (mostly black) deaths and the destruction of (mostly black) businesses. And even the left wing Washington Post accused Facebook of providing a platform for organisers of the march on Washington on January 6th.

These are dangerous times and there are no greater contributors to that danger, world wide, than the arrogant, censoring US Techs.

“World's Greatest Political Threat: Political Imperial Techs?”

Lessons from New Zealand

Catherine McBride

You really have to hand it to mighty New Zealand. It certainly punches above its weight. By the end of the Tokyo 2020 Olympics Games it had won 7 gold medals – more than larger countries such as Spain (3), Poland (4) or similar-sized Ireland (2). And New Zealand achieved this with relatively few Olympic athletes – its team of 220 participants looks large but about half are involved in team sports such as Football, Rugby 7s and Hockey. It only entered 20 athletes in athletics and swimming combined, concentrating its efforts instead on rowing and canoeing – where it won 6 of its 7 gold medals.

The secret to New Zealand's success is specialization – it plays to its strengths – and it does this in other activities as well. Most obviously its agricultural exports. New Zealand has a similar land mass to the UK – NZ is the 75th largest country in the world, just beating the UK at 78th. Admittedly New Zealand is closer to the equator stretching from about 35 degrees South to 45 degrees South (the UK covers 50 degrees to 59 degrees North), so New Zealand is warmer, has more sunlight and is slightly wetter than the UK with annual rainfall at 1250mm compared to the UK's 1154mm.

But there are a few major differences. New Zealand has a surprisingly small amount of arable land. According to the CIA World Fact Book, NZ has only 564,200 hectares of cultivated land growing everything from maize to apple orchards to grapevines. While the UK has about 11 times as much arable land at 6,163,100 ha. New Zealand has less grazing land than the UK as well: only 9 million hectares while the UK has 11.4 million ha of permanent and temporary grasslands. And yet New Zealand is a major exporter of agricultural products while the UK imports 45% of its food.

How can this be so? Well one difference that stands out is New Zealand's free market credentials – it was one of the first countries to drop all of its agricultural subsidies and embrace free trade. Incredibly, since doing this, although its agricultural exports have boomed, the amount of agricultural land in New Zealand has fallen considerably. According to the World Bank in 1980, 65% of New Zealand's land was used for agriculture but since subsidies were removed this area has fallen to just under 40%.

Meanwhile, and this isn't surprising, the UK's agriculture – still heavily subsidised on a per hectare basis – occupies 72% of UK land. And yet the UK imports 45% of its food – mostly from the EU – a similarly expensive and heavily subsidised producer. Additionally, according to the OECD, NZ employs 164,000 people in agriculture while the UK employs 319,000. DEFRA puts that figure at 476,000 but if true that only makes the UK appear even more hopeless – using more people and more land to not produce enough food to meet local demand.

So let's recap: NZ and the UK are of similar size; 72% of the UK is under agricultural use; agriculture employs between 319 to 476 thousand people depending on who you believe; and yet UK farms are unable to supply the UK's demand for food – even though they are heavily subsidized. While New Zealand only uses 40% of its land mass for agriculture, agriculture employs only 164 thousand people; New Zealand farms are completely unsubsidised and unprotected from international competition; and yet its agricultural production makes up about 80% of its total exports and is valued at over US$30 billion. In contrast, the UK's total income from farming was only £5.3 billion in 2019 and Defra puts agriculture's GVA at only £10.4 billion (US$14.4 billion).

While some will quickly point out New Zealand has a much smaller population to feed than the UK (5.1 m against 67.8m), I would retort the Kiwis are producing enough to feed their own population multiple times. For example, NZ exports 95% of its dairy products earning the country over US$10 billion, 94% of its sheep-meat, 87% of its beef, 90% of its Kiwifruit, 90% of its fish (by weight after cleaning), 85% of its onions, 86% of its apples, and 85% of its wine – with the US, UK and Australia its biggest customers even though both the US and Australia have domestic wine producing industries. So New Zealand could feed a population many times its own – provided they enjoy dairy, lamb, beef, wine, apples, kiwis, seafood, honey and onions.

And that is the point of this article and a lesson for the UK – New Zealand has become a successful exporter of food because it specialise in areas where it has a natural advantage. Spurred on no doubt by the fact that New Zealand farmers are unsubsidised – there is no government to fall back on for lazy, unlucky or simply chillaxed lifestyle farmers. Unlike the UK, the New Zealand government is worried by the amount of prime agricultural land being used for urban development and semi-rural lifestyle farmers who do not take the agricultural industry seriously.

Now the UK has just finished the sixth round of its trade negotiation with New Zealand. This trade deal should have interesting results. New Zealand imports cars, delivery vehicles, crude and refined oil, and pharmaceutical products, while it exports are focused on the aforementioned nine agricultural goods. Meanwhile UK trade is the polar opposite. It exports cars and other vehicles, crude and refined oil, and pharmaceutical products while importing pork, beef, lamb (in the off season), butter, cheese, fruit, vegetables and wine. Gee whiz – do you think these two countries could do a trade deal?

Well possibly, but no doubt the UK's National Farmers Unions (NFU) will be demanding protection as it did during the recently concluded

Lessons from New Zealand

Australian Trade Deal. But this time it will be harder to limit New Zealand imports with tiny quotas as the NZ lamb quota is already 114,000 tonnes. And astute UK shoppers will have noticed that New Zealand apples, kiwifruit and wine are already available in the UK – albeit apples mainly outside the UK apple season. But that does not mean that the UK's National Farmers Union won't be trying to stifle any concessions Liz Truss may give to New Zealand dairy or beef products. But I would urge Truss to hold firm and not to give in to these protectionists.

The embarrassing part of this trade deal is that New Zealand doesn't charge tariffs on many imports especially if they are products that New Zealand doesn't produce such as cars, vans, trucks – the government understands that this would only hurt New Zealand consumers. Even agricultural products like beef have no import tariff. Instead, it is the UK that will have to lower its tariffs and other trade barriers if it is to strike a trade deal. But why would the UK do this?

Well as we keep being told – the UK hopes that agreeing a trade deal with New Zealand will help it gain access to the Comprehensive and Progressive agreement for Trans-Pacific Partnership (CPTTP) – a group of 11 countries with a combined market value of $13 trillion. But, to achieve such a deal, the UK may have to drop its ridiculous agricultural protections. Although such a move will upset the NFU there are many consumers as well as secondary food manufacturers in the UK that would benefit from less expensive food or raw materials.

The UK Department for the Environment Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA) has recently published a massive tomb called the National Food Strategy (NFS) that reached fourteen rather contradictory recommendations for what we should be feeding our children as well as about the future of UK farming. If there is anyone interested in Whitehall in actually saving UK farming – I recommend they ignore the NFS and instead follow New Zealand's example: drop all farm subsidies including the so-called 'green' ones.

A swift dose of market reality will force UK farmers to concentrate on the products where the UK has a natural advantage and where there is market demand – even if that is just UK market demand. It is embarrassing that the UK farmers cannot even meet local demand in basic goods such as pork, beef, butter, or cheddar and yet demand protection from non-EU imported products by imposing massive tariffs and small quotas.

The NFU may try to protect its market by claiming some sort of environmental superiority over food imported from the other side of the world but as the National Food Strategy points out – if UK farmers used more intensive farming practices they could, like New Zealand, use less land for agriculture and more for habitat restoration and broadleaf forests.

But one problem with intensive agriculture is that it is only environmentally efficient if the animal feed is grown locally. If farmers are importing soymeal from Brazil or the US to feed their animals, then there will be little environmental advantage. It would be better to simply import the parts of the animal that you want to eat than to import the feed to produce a whole animal and then discard most of the carcass. If it takes 3 kg of imported feed from Brazil, to produce a 2 kg chicken in the UK, which will then be filleted to remove the 1kg of breast meat while the brown meat is exported to South Africa – environmentally it would be better to just import the chicken breast meat from Brazil. No doubt the NFU will disagree with this analysis – but as Mandy Rice Davies once said: 'they would say that wouldn't they'.

New Zealand has also worked this out and it has found markets for every part of a sheep. Sheep carcasses are divided into over 40 different cuts to supply different markets. Importers no longer waste fuel shipping whole carcasses around the world as they once did. This is good for the environment and good for importers. Leaving very little waste.

There are a lot of problems with UK farming that need to be addressed not just in terms of their environmental footprint, but also in their general efficiency. If an industry needs to be subsidised to survive, should it exist? Especially when there are alternative suppliers such as New Zealand. But for this the UK needs to drop its tariffs and trade barriers that limit the availability of New Zealand products in the UK market. This would be a massive bonus for UK consumers and help address the UK food poverty and inequality that the National Food Strategy highlights. It will not turn UK children into Dutch giants – that is more nature than nurture according to (NFS) page 60, but it may have the bonus of helping the UK join the CPTTP which would support the UK's service and industrial exports and consequently the UK Government's levelling up agenda.

Cost of supporting Brexit

A firefighter was unfairly dismissed from his union job after speaking at a pro-Brexit rally in Westminster, an employment tribunal has found.

Paul Embery was also barred from being a Fire Brigades Union (FBU) official for two years after appearing at the leave means leave rally in March 2019.

Norwich Employment Tribunal

ruled in August 2020 that he was "unfairly dismissed" after a which-hunt with a pre-determined outcome.

But it found Mr Embery was not dismissed for supporting Brexit itself.

UK negotiators

Dear Sir,

I do hope that we will somehow find a way to stop being so silly about matters such as the Northern Ireland Protocol.

There is a clear message included in the EU's behaviour. Namely that we MUST get the detailed terms of every agreement, whether important or relatively insignificant, 100% correct for the UK before signing any document.

Let us hope that those involved with negotiations will have learnt a lesson from their recent mistakes

Tesla's electric car problems

Dear Sir,

Why the UK authorities are insisting that we must all change to electric cars, many have questioned their safety aspects especially the autopilot system that is being encouraged?

The US federal agency in charge of road safety is opening an official investigation into Tesla's "self driving" Autopilot system.

The National Highway Traffic System Administration (NHTS) said it was acting following eleven Tesla crashes since 2018 involving emergency vehicles.

In some cases, the Tesla vehicle "crashed directly into the vehicles of first responders", it said.

The investigation will cover roughly 765,000 Tesla cars made since 2014.

Meanwhile last month in the UK six children and a parent were hurt by a car at Ardingley College, West Sussex, five of the children and the adult were taken to hospital.

The car involved was a blue Tesla, at "a holiday camp pickup" within the school grounds in the afternoon said the headteacher Ben Figgin. We await the cause of the accident.

Boris's failure

Dear Sir,

Having being a solid Brexiteer and a supporter of Boris's push for an independent UK, I am saddened by his lack of true ambition.

I like many would have preferred a clean break on WTO rules with the EU than this hopeless divorce agreement we have signed up to.

The situation with the Northern Ireland Protocol has only come about because of the lack of true grit with our over-rated politicians, and on that count Boris has a lot to answer for.

Theresa May who was happy to pretend that she was leading us out of EU control, while all the time creating a back-door way for the EU to continue with its relentless drive for controlling all aspects of our life.

Even at this late date Boris should be a real leader and correct the mess that he has allowed to happen under his watch.

The EU will never agree to any changes that remove their influence over the UK, the time has come for the UK to break the agreement because of the EU's unwillingness to make a sensible compromise. Northern Ireland will soon become a dangerous place to live and work in due to the dangers imposed by the EU. Breaking the agreement will create a lot of bad will and legal challenges, but it is better to deal with it quickly than allow it to fester for years to come.

Scottish independence

Dear Sir,

The recent news that Scotland's SNP and the Green party are forming an alliance in the Scottish Parliament will be used as a push for independence.

The agreement includes a commitment to hold a referendum within 5 years and preferably by the end of 2023.

The SNP have already managed to get the Scottish economy into a worse state than the rest of the UK's over the last 20 months. Let's hope their tax payers' can afford the increase in costs that independence will create. The rest of UK will no-longer subsidise them.

More UK good news

Plans for a £700 million "world-class" film and TV studios facility in the UK have been announced by a Hollywood studio.

The owners of Sunset Studios in Los Angeles and an investment firm have bought a 91-acre site in Hertfordshire for £120m.

Subject to planning permission, the production centre would be built in Broxbourne., creating jobs and prosperity.

The government said it was "supporting" the development of such stage spaces across the UK.

Switzerland's EU relationship

After years of talk, Switzerland has scrapped efforts aimed at agreeing an over-arching treaty with the EU.

Switzerland is not in the EU but has signed up to many of its policies such as freedom of movement.

The relationship is currently governed by more than 120 bilateral deals, and a failure to replace them with one framework deal could harm ties.

The EU Commission has said,

"We regret this decision, given the progress that has been made over the last years."
